

[...]once, at the end of my life, I am lucky. We have escaped from that starving desert at a spotâ€”at a spot where we can seeâ€” For a little while he could say no more, but sank upon the stony seat, and the hand with which he tried to point some distant landmark fell away. His face, which had been so pale before, became of a deadly whiteness, and he breathed with gasps of agony. I knelt before him and took his hands, and tried to rub the palms, and did whatever I could think of. Oh, father, father, you have starved yourself, and given every thing to me! What a brute I was to let you do it! But I did not know; I never knew! Please God to take me also! He could not manage to answer this, even if he understood it; but he firmly lifted his arm again, and tried to make me follow it. What does it matter? Oh, never mind, never mind such, a wretch as I am![...].
